And even if you don't want a compiler, you can run Linux from within Windows.Q: Java sockets. How to set Read timeout with TCP Streams. I'm writing a client/server application in Java with TCP Streams. How should I handle my read timeout in case a packet arrives after the timeout? What should I do about it? A: I would let a timeout occur, and save it as a packet in the buffer, and treat it as a new packet for subsequent processing. My library does something like this, it saves the exception, and returns a pre-populated Packet, so if there was a timeout it won't have to do anything about it. EDIT - So I'd do something like this, but have to make sure that the readData function is thread safe and non blocking - but just copy the data in and overwrite the old packet if there was a timeout, and you should be okay. ReadPacket myPacket; boolean timeout = false; ... try { myPacket = stream.readPacket(); } catch (SocketTimeoutException e) { timeout = true; } if (timeout) { // read timeout occured, so copy data and then reset the packet to null } else { // copy data in } stream.readData(myPacket); The trick is readPacket() being a blocking function, and you can't just call it because you are reading from a TCP socket. 1.
