Technical Field The invention is related to charged particle beam systems such as electron beam inspection systems and more particularly to an electron beam for use in an electron beam inspection system. 2. Electron beam inspection (EBI) is used to inspect die on a wafer for alignment of the die before packaging. Typically, EBI systems include an electron beam source capable of generating an electron beam. An electron beam is then generated from the electron beam source, and focused on the die. Electrons of the electron beam interact with the die, wherein some of the electrons are transferred from the electron beam to the die, and some of the electrons are transferred from the die back to the electron beam. These interactions between the electrons and the die produce scattering on the die which allows information about a scanned region of the die to be determined. Typically, only electrons having a particular kinetic energy transfer information about the scanned region. More specifically, some electrons in the electron beam have energies that produce scattering effects that are greater than those produced by electrons having lower energies. The range and kinetic energy of the electrons in the electron beam affect the position and strength of the scattering interactions. The electrons in the electron beam are generated in a continuous manner, which in turn generates a continuous electron beam. The source of the electrons in a continuous electron beam is often referred to as a discharge electron beam source. An electron beam generated by a discharge electron beam source includes electrons that are generated in a plasma, electrons that are generated by thermionic emission, etc. Hence, electrons in the continuous electron beam typically do not reflect well to a target even though electrons in the continuous electron beam have a particular kinetic energy. For example, while a continuous electron beam having relatively high kinetic energy is useful for EBI of die on a wafer, the electrons in the continuous electron beam are not well suited for EBI of wafers and/or printed circuit boards (PCB). In some cases, the continuous electron beam may not even be able to achieve enough resolution
