They are secreted by immunological cells and by non immune cells in response to local tissue damage. Cytokines form a coordinated network and are therefore key molecules in disease control. Methods ===== Sets of tools have been developed to evaluate changes in the relative levels of cytokines in response to a stimulus. The most widely used methods include, among others: 1\ Multiplexed bead arrays coupled with flow cytometry to quantify multiple cytokines. 2\ Enzyme-linked immunosorbent assays to measure cytokines released by cells. 3\ Real-time PCR to measure mRNA levels of cytokines. 4\ Single cell suspension flow cytometry to count cytokines released by single cells. For antibody-based detection the technical details of the immunoassay platform will determine the sensitivity and limit of detection for the assay. For example, detection sensitivity of specific cytokines will depend on the capture antibody selected and affinity of the detection antibody. Limit of detection will also depend on the cell number and concentration used in an experiment. Results ===== 1\ Cytokine arrays are a relatively cheap and effective method to monitor changes in cytokine levels. They can be used for large number of samples and have been used to study the roles of inflammatory cytokines in the context of innate and adaptive immune responses, as well as metabolic diseases. 2\ Cytokine arrays have been used to study the effect of vaccines on cytokine levels. One approach consists in measuring changes in cytokines in response to vaccination in the context of clinical trials. Another approach is the use of cytokine arrays to measure the immune response to vaccination in patients infected with HIV. 3\ Enzyme-linked immunosorbent assays are cheaper than multiplexed bead arrays. They are also less labor-intensive and can be used to profile a large number of cytokines. They are more suitable for measuring changes in cytokine levels over time. 4\ Single cell suspension flow cytometry is a very sensitive technique to measure cytokine secretion at the single cell level. It requires the use
