When creating new images in such a manner, Lightroom 5 fits nicely into a workflow that is very similar to the camera: load the camera's image to Lightroom, do some basic adjustments and work on your item until it is ready to be saved and sent off into the world (or it's the right time to head out for lunch or, you know, buy some tea on Amazon). When you have taken a photo in your new favorite application, simply go back to Lightroom to continue your development. Lightroom 5 will do all the work for you in most situations. You are, of course, always welcome to fiddle with the Adjustments panel at any time, but I find it easier to work with than Adobe's previous incarnation. The redesigned module lets you quickly change the color temperature of your image with settings you've already chosen or from a catalog for later use, or create a scene or specific mood by using presets available in a catalog. In the new Adjustment panel, you can also activate or deactivate at any given time, all the various setting options that are included in one place now, right from Lightroom. If you're a professional photographer using a set of preset Develop module settings, you can now create a special, completely personalized selection of presets just for you inside Lightroom if you are working with multiple presets. When you save a shot as a JPEG file, Lightroom 5 will name the file according to how you've adjusted it. So, if you add a Brightness adjustment, you can name it Brightness, if you add Contrast, you can name it Contrast, but if you add Gamma, the name may be Gamma, if you're adjusting vignette, you may want to use one of the pre-named vignette types, and then, if the image is HDR, you may want to call it HDR. There is an option to use custom file naming as well.
