Adobe has, of course, been overhauling and fine-tuning Lightroom for several years now. Lightroom 5, which was officially introduced in August, is its fifth major upgrade. There are plenty of other improvements also; there are a number of video tutorials on Adobe's website, but for now, just the new features of Lightroom 5 are interesting. Firstly, I'd like to put to bed the widespread misconception that "Lightroom is just a stupid collection of plug-ins." In fact, Lightroom has long boasted formidable capabilities. It is one of the primary tools in my workflow for RAW-format digital photography, and with hundreds of plug-ins supporting raw format converters, I can do many things with my photos and video that would otherwise be impossible. I personally use Lightroom for editing photos I haven't loaded into the camera, and for retouching images I've already opened in the camera. I could write an entire book just about the Lightroom program itself; I have written more than 40 articles about that program in the past few years. I have even composed a full-fledged course about Lightroom, which you can find here . As I finally get to the point where I am about to conclude, I can honestly state that Photoshop is the single best image processing tool in the universe. I am not exaggerating. And for those who are just looking for a simple suite of tools, it's impossible to not recommend it. However, one should keep in mind that most of its functions are just as simple as they are powerful. Consider it as a challenge and a restriction. Yes, Photoshop does a great job of answering the question "how does my camera work?", but it equally well answers the question "how can I improve my photos?" In that sense, there's motivation to work constantly when editing photos using Photoshop. My wife and I have different tastes, so if I want to convert my photos into her taste, I have to get sweaty with Photoshop. If I like your photos, I must work hard to make them mine. Same goes for the other way around. In any case, I see no reason to restrain myself and get away from it. In fact, the only thing that doesn't grab me is cropping. You have to do that in Photoshop if you need it, though, because it's not supported in the image browser. That's just a small complaint, because in general, Photoshop is just awesome.
